
International Environmental Standards and Corporate Policies:

AN INTEGRATIVE FRAMEWORK

Dennis A. Rondinelli
Gyula Vastag

In North America, Western Europe, and many of the more prosperous countries in Asia and Latin America, public demand for environmental protection is increasing. Public concern has risen due to expanding knowledge about the adverse health impacts of environmental degradation and pollution and as a result of the increasing technical capacity to detect toxic substances in the environment at lower concentrations. Demand for more stringent environmental regulations and enforcement is enhanced by growing public fear as well as increased public emphasis on industry responsibility.¹

The proliferation of international standards for environmental management, such as the ISO 14000 guidelines, will discourage multinational firms from engaging in hazardous environmental practices, such as locating plants that generate hazardous emissions in poor countries with weak environmental regulations. Furthermore, corporate policies that promote environmentally sound, efficiency-embracing, innovative technologies and processes will contribute to establishing 21st century production and distribution systems that are far less environmentally degrading and wasteful.²

The worldwide movement toward more efficient and effective environmental management will profoundly influence the policies of multinational corporations.³ Yet most companies still have not applied the same rigorous analysis to environmental decision making as they have to other types of corporate decisions. Although environmentalists argue that there are strong business opportunities in environmental protection, many business executives still often see only the potential threats of rising costs, decreasing competitiveness, and increasing legal challenges.⁴ The debate over whether environmental protection poses a threat or opportunity for business will not soon be settled.
