Abstract

To identify the occupational health and safety (OHS) risks among environmental health officers (EHOs) in Australia and New Zealand. The objectives were to profile and compare OHS experiences from different countries and regions to gain a regional perspective on OHS hazards that impact EHOs.

An online hazard exposure survey was conducted among 339 EHOs (Australia: $n = 301$, 88.8%; New Zealand: $n = 38$, 11.2%). The Mann–Whitney U test was used to compare 2 ordinal data groups, the Kruskal–Wallis H test was used for more than 2 ordinal groups, and the independent samples t test was used to compare the means of 2 independent groups where the dependent variables were normally distributed. Multiple regression techniques were used to analyze workplace incidents and age groups. A high degree of similarity in the types of workplace exposures and risk perceptions as well as concerns with organizational OHS management commitment were observed among EHOs from the 2 countries. Workplace violence and physical and psychosocial demands were the most commonly reported OHS hazards. Employer type, sex, and age group were significantly related to workplace exposure and OHS experience among EHOs in both countries. This study provides a profile of workplace exposure in the environmental health profession in the 2 countries and offers recommendations for the implementation of preventive action.

Abbreviations: EHOs = environmental health officers, NHEWS = National Hazard Exposure Worker Surveillance Survey, OHS = occupational health and safety.

Keywords: environmental health officers, occupational health and safety, workplace exposure

1. Introduction

While every occupation is associated with potential exposure to hazards and risks of illnesses and injuries, little is known about the trends and magnitude of workplace health and safety risks among environmental health officers (EHOs). As in other professions, unsafe behavior and occupational health and safety (OHS) practices among EHOs can be motivated by internal and external factors.^[1] It is also suggested that EHOs perceive workplace risks as an inherent part of their jobs, which influences their risk perceptions and tolerance.

The objectives of this study were to determine if any differences in EHOs workplace health and safety experiences exist between Australia and New Zealand based on their existing practices of environmental health, and to determine whether employer descriptions, years of work experience, and other demographic factors (i.e., age, sex, employer type, and years worked as an EHO) may be used to predict workplace exposures among EHOs.

1.1. Environmental health workforce

The environmental health workforce comprises generalist EHOs or specialist professionals who focus on particular aspects, such as environmental noise, public health engineering, and food hygiene. EHOs are entrusted with implementing measures to protect public health and are mostly employed by the local government, also known as councils. The approach to environmental health is similar in Australia and New Zealand; it focuses on assessing, correcting, and preventing the impact of environmental health stressors on communities. However, the work scope of EHOs in New Zealand is narrower, with a stronger focus on health compliance. In both countries, the functions of EHOs may vary slightly from council to council, depending on jurisdiction, environment, and resource levels. These functions include the investigation, sampling, measurement, and assessment of hazardous environmental agents in various environmental media and settings. This informs the formulation of appropriate recommendations for the
