Department of Biology, Federal University of Technology, Akure, Nigeria.

Received 23 June, 2015; Accepted 26 July, 2015

Amoebiasis is one of the major causes of morbidity and mortality world wide, especially in developing countries because of lack of safe potable water and low level of hygiene due to high level of poverty. This study determined the prevalence and spatial distribution of amoebiasis in school age children in Akure, Ondo State, Nigeria. Two hundred and seventy eight (278) stool samples were examined for the cyst or trophozoites of Entamoeba histolytica using direct smear and floatation techniques. One hundred and eighty-eight (67.6%) of the samples were found to be positive for the parasite. Females (68.3%) were more infected than males (66.9%), but there was no significant difference between prevalence and sex. Children within the age group of 4 to 6 years old had the highest rate (85.3%) of infection. There was a significant difference between prevalence and the age groups. The highest prevalence of 33 (94.3%), 58 (95.0%), 80 (88.9%) and 73 (91.3%) were recorded among children who drink water fetched from the stream, buy food from food vendors, use pit toilet and were de-wormed nine months before stool sample collection ($P < 0.05$). Improved sanitation, personal hygiene and policy for regular de-worming of school age children by parents and Government will decrease the rate of intestinal infections.

Key words: Prevalence, Entamoeba histolytica, amoebiasis, infection, hygiene, children.

INTRODUCTION

Intestinal parasites infection (IPIs) are globally endemic and have been described as constituting the greatest single world wide causes of illness and diseases (Steketee, 2003). Amoebiasis is a condition due to the infection by Entamoeba histolytica and is known to cause about 450 million infections per annum in developing countries, with an incidence of about 50 million and 100,000 deaths (Raydin and Petri, 1995). Intestinal Amoebiasis is said to be the world greatest cause of death attributed to parasitic infection after malaria and schistosomiasis (Walsh, 1995). The infection is acquired through the faecal-oral route by consumption of food, water or drinks contaminated with cysts of the parasite. Licking or sucking of faecally contaminated hands have been documented to introduce the infection to humans (Aribodor et al., 2012).
