

ENVIRONMENTAL PROBLEMS OF PACIFIC RIM DEVELOPMENT

JANE V. HALL, DUANE L. CHAPMAN, WILLIAM F. BARRON, CLEMENT A. TISDELL*

Hall: This panel will focus on the environmental, natural resource, and ecosystem issues that are arising as the Asian countries of the Pacific Rim develop, some at extraordinary rates of economic growth. There are a number of unique challenges, and each speaker will touch on them in different ways. The rate and scale of economic development, industrialization and urbanization are unprecedented, as are the related mobilization of natural resources and use of environmental sinks to absorb pollution. At the same time, concern is growing and efforts are underway to understand the nature of the problems and to develop effective environmental management schemes to deal with them.

Close proximity and interconnected ecosystems throughout the region increase the urgency of addressing the effects of scale and the rate of change. Effective solutions will require integrated perspectives and perhaps new institutions among countries and regions that often are not accustomed to making effective joint decisions. Absent rapid action and cooperation, the standard economic notion that summing local optima results in optimization for the entire system is likely to lead to degradation rather than to system optimization. Attempting to manage the environment piecemeal is analogous to thinking that partial equilibrium analysis is sufficient to understand and manage a complex exchange economy. As economists, we need to be more mindful of the interconnectedness of the natural systems and the consequent special complications while we simultaneously try to understand and prescribe solutions.

Rapid economic growth in Asia holds both the promise of steadily rising incomes and the threat of a rapidly deteriorating environment in terms of pollution and loss of natural areas. The World Bank and other institutions view the long term favorably, assuming that rising per capita incomes will lead to environmental protection. We cannot be confident, however, that this protection will come soon enough—if it comes at all—to ameliorate the harm that may have been done, especially regarding international impacts and biodiversity.

The first speaker is Duane Chapman, who is Professor of Resource and Environmental Economics at Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y. He also is Coordinator of the Climate Change Research Program at Cornell and leader of a U.S. Agency for International Development team on Energy, Industry, and the Urban Environment. He serves on the Editorial Board of Contemporary Economic Policy, one of WEA International's two journals.

*Hall is Professor of Economics and a member of the Institute for Economic and Environmental Studies, California State University, Fullerton. Chapman is Professor of Resource and Environmental Economics and Coordinator of the Climate Change Program, Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y.; he also is leader of a U.S. Agency for International Development team on Energy, Industry, and the Urban Environment. Barron is Director of the Interdepartmental Graduate Program in Environmental Management, University of Hong Kong. Tisdell is Professor and Head, Department of Economics, University of Queensland, Brisbane, Australia. This is an edited transcription of a general session at the Western Economic Association International Pacific Rim Conference, Hong Kong, January 12, 1994. Darwin C. Hall, California State University, Long Beach organized the session.
