Remaining Challenges

IT WAS WITH THE SO-CALLED ‘POLLUTION SESSION OF THE DIET’ IN NOVEMBER 1970 THAT JAPAN’S NATIONAL GOVERNMENT first tackled environmental issues in earnest. Fourteen environment-related laws were passed during that parliamentary session, signaling a policy shift from the previous emphasis on economic growth to a greater emphasis on pollution prevention. The results became evident in a reduction in industrial pollution, with large declines in emissions of pollutants from stationary sources and a rapid increase during the 1970s in the number of locations meeting water quality standards for hazardous substances and air quality standards for sulfur dioxide.

These changes were deemed a ‘pollution miracle’ (Broadbent, 1998, p. 18) and have been the subject of numerous studies about policy (Tsuru and Weidner, 1989; UNU, 1993; Tsuru, 1999; Matsuno, 2007). Since the 1980s, some have suggested that Japan’s experience could be applied where pollution problems have become rampant in developing regions that are on the path toward industrialization, and there has been some debate about the transferability of this experience (ICETT, 1994; World Bank, 1994, 2005; Kojima et al., 1995; Imura and Schreurs, 2005).

Not all of Japan’s pollution problems were resolved with the pollution miracle, however. In 1994, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) pointed out a number of Japan’s remaining air pollution issues, including nitrogen dioxide (NO₂), photochemical oxidants, fine particulates and hazardous substances (OECD, 1994). Particularly serious pollutants included NO_x and suspended particulate matter (SPM) from vehicle exhaust. In contrast to sulfur dioxide pollution, which was largely resolved in the 1980s, the concentrations of these pollutants continued to fail environmental quality standards for urban areas. Health pollution victims in urban areas such as Tokyo and Osaka launched lawsuits demanding roadway closures and compensation for damages. When reviewing Japanese environmental policies even after 1994, the OECD advised that Japan needed to reduce emissions of nitrous oxides (NO_x) and fine particulates (OECD, 2010).

Issues relating to waste management also remain unresolved. The handling of municipal waste is the responsibility of Japan’s 1816 municipalities nationwide, of which 313 municipalities (17.2 percent) do not have final disposal sites (fiscal year 2007). Seventy-eight percent of municipal waste is incinerated, but 330 000 tons of incineration ash ends up buried in final disposal sites in other prefectures (Ministry of the Environment, 2009a). Municipalities on the receiving end of the incineration ash have voiced strong dissent. Industrial waste treatment is the responsibility of businesses and involves high costs; illegal dumping to avoid those costs has become an important public concern nationwide.

With the exception of enclosed water bodies, water quality in Japan has improved considerably with increased coverage of sewerage systems. The OECD pointed out the inadequacy of Japan’s sewerage system coverage rate in 1994, but it has increased from 49 percent at that time to 72.7 percent in 2008 (Japan Sewage Works Association, 2010). Today 84.8 percent of the total population is served by combined household wastewater treatment facilities for sewerage treatment, and this figure rises to 99.3 percent in cities with populations over one million (Ministry of
