INTRODUCTION

Exclusive breastfeeding is the most ideal method to provide nutrition for infants in the first sixth months of their life. (Motee & Jeewon, 2014) This method is proven to reduce mortality and morbidity in infants (Sankar et al., 2015) Exclusive breastfeeding also has enormous direct benefits for the growth, development and nutritional status of children (Victoria, 2016) Research shows significant correlation between the low rate of breastfeeding and the high incidence of stunting. (Kumar & Singh, 2015; Terati et al., 2018) Other studies also prove the correlation between non-breastfeeding infants and the increasing incidence of obesity in children (Yan et al., 2014) The Ministry of Health of the Republic of Indonesia records the number of exclusively national breastfeeding amounted to 35.73% in 2017. This number is still far from national breastfeeding prevalence target set at 80% (Kementerian pemberdayaan perempuan dan perlindungan anak & Badan Pusat Statistik, 2019)

Breastfeeding is a natural part of the reproductive process of a woman (WHO and UNICEF, 2003) A lot of problems that arise in the breastfeeding process are usually caused by problems that can be prevented, such as lack of proper attachment, the wrong position of the baby during the nursing process, and mothers who do
