

Heathland and Moorland Ecosystems

Introducing the ecosystems

Heaths can be defined as dwarf scrub plant communities with woody branching stems, and very small evergreen leaves, adapted to reduce water loss from transpiration, as the heaths cannot tolerate periods of prolonged drought. Heaths are also adapted to grow on soils with low nutrient availability such as acidic podsoils which have a pH of between 3.5 and 5. Fig. 1 shows how the heather plant is adapted to its habitat.

Fig 1. The heather plant and its adaptations.

Heathlands can occur in lowland areas such as Southern Britain or Eastern Netherlands. They form on porous sandy soils such as those associated with tertiary sands (e.g. Bagshot) or outwash sands from ice sheets (Eastern Netherlands or Jutland). Where the soils are cleared of woodland cover, the rain leaches out the nutrients, leaving the soil impoverished and only able to support plants that are specially adapted to these acidic conditions. Lowland heaths are often dominated by species of heather, usually ling, and gorse, but if poorly managed encroachment by bracken and grass takes place.

Moorlands can be defined as upland heathlands. In Britain they occur above 250 metres, mainly on resistant impervious rocks of upland Britain, such as the Millstone grit of the Pennines. Many of these rocks are acidic and therefore supply few nutrients to the soil, which combines with the climatic conditions to provide an environment which restricts plant growth. The high altitude leads to strong winds, lower temperatures (impact of an environmental lapse rate of 1°C per 100 metres), increased relief rainfall often of over 1250 mm per annum, and the greater cloud cover restricts the amount of sunshine. The result is an ecosystem of low primary productivity and low diversity dominated by heathers (Calluna and Erica). The heather moors are associated with grass moorland and blanket peat bogs. Sedges and rushes develop in wetter grassland areas and on flat badly drained sites peat bogs develop.

Fig 2. summarises the distribution of the two types of heathland community in Great Britain.

Fig 2. Distribution of Heathlands in Great Britain

However whilst it is possible to distinguish between lowland heaths and upland heather moorlands and they form two very distinctive ecosystems (see Figs 3a and 3b overleaf) they do have many common features (see p3).
