

Educational Theory and Practice

Regina Schoenfeld-Tacher ■ Henry J. Baker

We live in an era of ever-expanding volume and complexity of knowledge and technology. As our understanding of what is possible expands, so do our expectations of what veterinary graduates should be capable of achieving. These increased expectations have been articulated in a variety of public policy statements such as the core competencies listed in the Association of American Veterinary Medical Colleges (AAVMC) self-study document<sup>1</sup> and the North American Veterinary Medical Education Consortium (NAVMEC) report.<sup>2</sup> With these increased standards come increasing demands on faculty to provide more and more instruction on both technical and non-technical competencies in a curriculum that is already stretched to its limits. As veterinary education evolves to meet these newly perceived requirements, emphasis has been placed on the desired qualities of graduates, but too little has been communicated on how to help faculty develop the tools and skills to achieve these desired results. This issue of JVME addresses this need by providing a venue for sharing ideas and inspiration regarding the application of educational theory and practice to veterinary education. Our call for papers on the topic of educational theory and practice resulted in an unexpectedly large outpouring of interest, promises to contribute, and submission of manuscripts. We are encouraged by this high level of commitment expressed by experts in education and by the number and quality of the initial wave of manuscripts submitted. There have been many more submissions than could be processed for this first installment and we expect that future issues of JVME will continue to highlight this series.

Historically, veterinary education has been provided by veterinary faculty who received little or no formal training in educational theories and relied on their own experiences as students to form their teaching practices. Generally, this approach includes a heavy emphasis on acquiring information, retaining facts, and applying knowledge through apprenticeships in a teaching hospital. This method has educated many generations of highly successful veterinarians; however, important advances in biomedical and educational sciences require modification of this time-honored method of instruction. The instructor-oriented, fact learning, repetitive practice system could be successful only as long as the volume of information was manageable. The logarithmic growth of knowledge and skills expected of current veterinarians challenges historically successful educational methods and requires a more efficient system of student-centered instruction, with an emphasis on problem-based reasoning and lifelong learning. This new approach places responsibility for learning on the students and offers them methods that encourage understanding and application of deductive reasoning without dependence on dogma that has been shown to have a half-life of only a decade. Developments in adult learning theory have shown the value of providing opportunities that support students' intellectual growth and the use of critical reflection in problem solving. It is equally important to guide students' development of professional skills necessary to practice the art of veterinary medicine, including interpersonal collaboration and communication, ethical decision making, responsible conduct of research, fact-based practice, and so forth. It is no longer sufficient for graduate veterinarians to simply be familiar with the current "facts" and demonstrate mastery via multiple-choice exams. Enhanced models, such as those by Schmidt et al.<sup>3</sup> and Dreyfus,<sup>4</sup> define the intellectual skills that a competent medical practitioner is expected to possess. These, in combination with evaluation schema, such as Miller's pyramid,<sup>5</sup> provide the tools needed to better evaluate students' knowledge. It is no longer reasonable to expect a classically trained veterinarian to possess all the necessary skills and to also be an outstanding teacher unless they have taken steps to broaden their understanding of best practices in the learning process. In recognition of these new educational challenges and opportunities to improve the education of veterinary students, leaders of Colleges of Veterinary Medicine are beginning to realize the need for faculty to acquire and develop additional teaching skills. To assist in this academic development, faculty members are provided opportunities for growth as educators through in-service training, guest lectures, seminars, and international meetings. In addition, educational specialists are gradually being added to veterinary faculty to guide, encourage, and enhance the teaching skills of their fellow faculty.

The topics presented in this series reflect the educational theories and methods that are being incorporated into veterinary curricula. The manuscripts are a snapshot of our colleagues' current areas of interest, most of which are being used successfully in current veterinary courses or are in early stages of application to veterinary education and are of interest to veterinary faculty for future applications.

The first paper of this issue, by Catricea Bell, embodies the rationale for this series. Dr. Bell describes the current situation, in which most faculty teaching veterinary medicine are expected to produce outstanding veterinary graduates without the benefit of formal training in teaching skills or adult learning theories. There is no doubt that current instructors and administrators are making strides in improving the quality of veterinary education, but this paper addresses how global communication and collaboration can further enhance development of educational theory and practice in veterinary medical education.

Enjoying the Beat of Expression: An Psychological Symphony within Hegels Educational Theory And Practice

In some sort of consumed by monitors and the ceaseless chatter of fast connection, the melodic elegance and emotional symphony developed by the published word frequently disappear in to the back ground, eclipsed by the constant sound and interruptions that permeate our lives. Nevertheless, located within the pages of Hegels Educational Theory And Practice a charming fictional prize overflowing with raw emotions, lies an immersive symphony waiting to be embraced. Constructed by an outstanding composer of language, this captivating masterpiece conducts visitors on a psychological journey, well unraveling the concealed songs and profound affect resonating within each cautiously constructed phrase. Within the depths of this moving analysis, we can explore the book is key harmonies, analyze its enthralling publishing fashion, and surrender ourselves to the profound resonance that echoes in the depths of readers souls.
