Abstract—Adaptive workload prediction is a key challenge in proactive auto-scaling. This paper presents a novel adaptive workload prediction framework based on machine learning. The framework consists of a data collection module, a feature extraction module, a model training module, and a prediction module. The data collection module collects historical workload data from the PaaS system. The feature extraction module extracts features from the collected data. The model training module trains a machine learning model using the extracted features. The prediction module uses the trained model to predict the future workload. The framework is evaluated using real-world workload data from a PaaS system. The results show that the framework achieves high prediction accuracy and low prediction error. The framework is also evaluated using synthetic workload data. The results show that the framework achieves high prediction accuracy and low prediction error. The framework is also evaluated using real-world workload data from a PaaS system. The results show that the framework achieves high prediction accuracy and low prediction error.
