

A General Education Technology Systems Course: Planning, Design, and Implementation

Ahmad Zargari
Morehead State University

As students from today's educational institutions graduate and enter the world of work, it is critical that they are capable of integrating and using their academic skills to improve their potentials in solving social problems. To accomplish this, educational institutions offer a curriculum that provides students with an opportunity to acquire a basic understanding of the society in which they live. Because we live in a complex world in which the preparation of technologically literate citizens appears to be essential to our well-being, it seems logical that the study of technology should become an integral part of the liberal arts curriculum for all university students.

The technology systems course has been integrated into the practical living category of the general education curriculum at Morehead State University. During the Fall Semester 1997 and Spring Semester 1998, the technology systems course was offered to approximately 30 students each semester. The majority of these students were incoming freshmen attending Morehead State University. A preliminary assessment of the course indicates that the students were able to successfully develop intended technical and technological competencies. This article will provide an overview of the course as implemented and explore the following questions: (a) What should the content be in a general education technology systems course? and (b) What strategies should be used to implement a technology systems course?

Liberal Arts and Study of Technology

Scholars and educational leaders suggest that the main objective of liberal education is to help emancipate individuals from ignorance, prejudice, and narrowness by providing information, awareness, and understanding of various life issues. If the purpose of liberal education is to help individuals develop an orderly mind for a productive life, then technological literacy must be provided as an integral part of that education.

According to Bensen (1995), "Technology is a phenomenon that is unfolding throughout our global society at an unprecedented pace and with incredible ramifications. Everyone uses technology" (p. 1). We are surrounded by technology. Technology is an integral part of our society and culture. Hardly a moment of our time goes by without the influence of technology. Technology affects the way we live, work, teach, learn, and confront our problems.

The fundamental reason to study technology as a part of the general education curriculum is the promotion of technological literacy. This involves the generation of new knowledge and improvement of processes to develop technological systems that extend human potentials to solve societal problems (Dugger & Satchwell, 1996; Jenkins, 1997).

Higher education must cultivate the liberal arts in a democratic spirit, which is also practical. We must challenge students to not only use and manage technology but also explore all related issues including technology systems, developments, ethics, impacts, and limitations. If the purpose of the liberal arts is to cultivate knowledge and reason and to provide opportunities for students to deepen their sensitivity and improve their capacity to face and manage societal problems (Boyer, 1987), the study of technology must be at the core of that education (Peterson, 1992; Waetjen, 1987). This statement implies that to prepare technologically literate citizens, colleges and universities
