Abstract: The indentation-induced deformation mechanisms in InP(100) single crystals were investigated by using nanoindentation and cross-sectional transmission electron microscopy (XTEM) techniques. The results indicated that there were multiple “pop-in” events randomly distributed in the loading curves, which were conceived to arise primarily from the dislocation nucleation and propagation activities. An energetic estimation on the number of nanoindentation-induced dislocations associated with pop-in effects is discussed. Furthermore, the fracture patterns were performed by Vickers indentation. The fracture toughness and the fracture energy of InP(100) single crystals were calculated to be around $1.2 \text{ MPa} \cdot \text{m}^{3/2}$ and 14.1 J/m^2 , respectively.

1. Introduction

Nowadays, nanoindentation is extensively used to characterize the mechanical properties (such as hardness and elastic modulus) and elastic or plastic deformation behaviors of various nanoscale materials [1–6] and thin films [7–12]. In general, from the nanoindentation responses manifested in the load-displacement (P - h) curves, one can obtain the primary mechanical characteristics of the materials being measured. For instance, the onset of plastic deformation behaviors in crystalline materials is often characterized by sudden bursts of displacements at a nearly constant indentation load in the P - h curves. These phenomena, known as “pop-in,” have been ubiquitously observed and often considered to be a result of dislocation activity during the nanoindentation process [13,14]. Lorenz et al. [15] proposed that the pop-in event is originated from homogeneous dislocation nucleation beneath the indenter tip. This scenario is reasonably in line with the low probability of encountering the pre-existing dislocations. Furthermore, previous cross-sectional transmission electron microscopy (XTEM) observations [14,16,17] evidenced the intimate correlations between pop-in events and dislocation activities in many nanoindentation studies [14–17].

Owing to its high electron velocity and the direct bandgap ($\sim 1.35 \text{ eV}$), zincblende-structured indium phosphide (InP) has been regarded as one of the most important III-V semiconductors. Currently, applications based on InP have been realized in a wide variety of electronic and photonic devices and systems, such as high-power and high-frequency electronics, solar cells,
