

Wavell to mount a joint attack with General Charles de Gaulle's small Free French forces in early June. At the same time, Wavell was anxious to push back Rommel and relieve the port of Tobruk, where the mostly Australian troops were still holding out, just to make life even harder for Wavell. Rashid Ali al-Gaylani had mounted a pro-Axis coup in Iraq. Britain controlled a vast swathe of territory from Palestine to India and having an openly hostile political leader in Iraq at this time was intolerable. Troops were sent from India and air forces from RAF Middle East, and the rising was quickly quelled, but after the defeat of Greece and Crete, Wavell's Middle East Command was horribly overstretched. Operation EXPORTER, the battle for Syria, was launched on 8 June, while Operation BATTLEAXE, in the Western Desert in Egypt, began a week later, on the 15th. As was now so often proving the way for the British in the Mediterranean and Middle East, fortunes ebbed and flowed.

After three days of intense and blisteringly hot battle with little progress being made, Wavell was forced to call off BATTLEAXE with Tobruk still out of reach. There was better news in Syria, however. On 21 June, Damascus fell, and three weeks later, on 11 July, the Vichy French surrendered. The Eastern Mediterranean was now secure.

Germany invaded the Soviet Union on 21 June 1941. At the same time, German spies were agitating dissent against the British in Iran, which threatened Britain's aid route to Russia through the Persian Gulf. When the British and Soviets jointly demanded the expulsion of all German nationals, the Tehran government refused. On 25 August a joint Anglo-Russian force invaded Iran, occupied Tehran, and the Persian Gulf was secured. East Africa was now almost entirely in British hands; the Middle East all the way to India was secure; and, despite the defeat in Crete and Greece, the British command in the Mediterranean and Middle East theatre was now finally free to concentrate its efforts on North Africa.

General Wavell, however, had been sacked as British C-in-C. His had been a thankless task and he had been horribly overstretched, but Churchill correctly sensed that he lacked the people skills and dynamic flair that were needed. Wavell was replaced by General Auchinleck, who had been the 'Auk' of the 'Auk'.
