

Families Against Society: A Study of Reactions to Children with Birth Defects

By Rosalyn Benjamin Darling

Beverly Hills, California: Sage Publications, Inc., 1979. 256 pp.

This book describes a study by the author of "the interactional adaptations of parents of children with severe birth defects" (p. 17). Initial incentive for the study derived from Darling's interest in physicians' decisions to withhold medical treatment from certain infants with severe birth defects. Typically, these decisions were physiologically-based judgments of the potential quality-of-life of the infant. Darling, a sociologist, wished to augment these judgments by examining sociological quality-of-life variables, specifically self-esteem, in relation to those children surviving the neonatal period. The study subsequently broadened into an investigation of how parents developed positive or negative definitions of their disabled children, the implication being that self-esteem is largely a function of parental evaluation.

Employing a symbolic interactionist perspective, the author attempts to describe the developmental process of definition formulation that parents undergo following the birth of their child. The author hypothesizes that parents' interactional experiences, particularly with medical personnel, are important determinants of this process.

The methodology of the study was primarily qualitative. Twenty-five parents, randomly selected from the files of a University Genetics Counseling Service, were interviewed. Eight topics were covered: background information, personal knowledge, attitudes and experiences, birth, infancy, and childhood, later childhood, and adolescence, and expectations for the future. Supplementing interview data was a self-report measure completed by each parent. A comparison "control sample" of five families from a local childbirth education organization were also interviewed and tested.

Due to the importance of medical personnel to these families, a randomly selected sample of fifteen pediatricians were interviewed. The foci of these interviews were "the situation of first informing parents that their child has a birth defect and the desirability of treating children with serious birth defects in everyday practice" (pp. 99-100).

Results of the study indicated that the parents' perceptions of their children were positive and positive. In contrast to their portrayal in the psychoanalytic literature, parents did not attempt to deny their child's disability nor claim they would not prefer their child to be normal. Rather, they adopted a present time orientation
