The Family's Construction of Reality, by David Reiss, Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1981, 426 pp., $26.00 cloth.

The main objective of Reiss's book is "to develop a theory of family process focusing on the transactions of the family with its social world" (p. 373). He has succeeded admirably. The Family's Construction of Reality is a seminal work with a remarkable mix of depth and range. Reiss presents not only the ideas he has evolved but also how he arrived at them. Thus, methodological "trivia" and the sweep of new theory receive the same painstakingly thoughtful regard.

Reiss's theory—the result of a fifteen-year research effort—centers on the concept of paradigm, a concept borrowed from Kuhn's (3) analysis of scientific process. Paradigms function both as framing assumptions and as patterns of family action. As framing assumptions, they specify for family members certain fundamental properties of the perceptual world; how the perceptual world is to be investigated; what conclusions can be drawn from those investigations; and how such conclusions shape a range of family action. As organizing patterns of daily living, paradigms shape the family's relationship with its social environment, synchronize each member's action and planning with others in the family, and maintain the family's continuity with its past.

The book is divided into three major sections. In Part I, Reiss evolves his basic argument: that the transactions that individuals in a family have with the outside world are coordinated by a shared concept of the fundamental nature or structure of that world. Critical to Reiss's presentation has been the transformation of his concepts into sets of variables and operational measures of these variables. He decided to study family problem-solving in the laboratory, where the keystone of his method—analysis of the way in which families solved abstract puzzles—could be tested under controlled conditions. He ingeniously extended the use of these common procedures for studying family process.

From a number of these laboratory-based studies examining the relationship of family assumptions and family performance, Reiss has evolved a "typology of shared constructs." Different assumptions, he proposes, lead to radically different orientations of experience, both within the family and between the family and the environment.

Reiss describes three types of family orientation: (a) environment-sensitive families, which are open to experience and develop strategies for accommodating their shared assumptions and beliefs with their environments; (b) consensus-sensitive families, which are more guarded about the environment and develop strategies for controlling and coordinating assumptions and beliefs among their members; (c) distance-sensitive families, which view the demands of the environment simply as a means by which individual members can demonstrate to the others their independence from the family and their own decisiveness and mastery.¹

Here then is the heart of the book: the proposition that shared constructs act as control factors within the family and between the family and its environment. This is the rudiment of a truly explanatory theory of family process. It need not be confined to the laboratory but may be used to understand a variety of problems in everyday life such as moving into a new neighborhood; dealing with schools, churches, welfare programs; and so forth. In other words, Reiss's typology of shared construct becomes a typology of families.

The remainder of Part I is devoted to refinement of the specific dimensions that underlie problem-solving behaviors of different family types. Researchers will feast on the author's densely detailed attempts, here and in later sections, to establish empirical proof of the predictive power of his theory. He succeeds not perfectly, but to an inspiring degree. He describes developing the predictions; the reasoning behind them; how these led to further statistical manipulations and the design of new studies; revisions in his reasoning; and the refinement and extension of the model. The integrity of his account points the way toward investigative dialogues whose result should make their mark in the family literature for years to come.

In Part II, Reiss explains how a family elaborates and maintains its construction of reality, that is, how the family's developmental history shapes its shared assumptions about the world. Here the conceptual cornerstone is periods of crisis. Like many family therapists, he believes that crisis can be a source of change. But he goes further, conceptualizing the nature of that change. He argues that the fundamental process by which a family recovers from crisis is by means of collaborative (re)construction of reality. This reconstruction is first in the definition of the crisis itself, which forms the nucleus of the family's recovery, and then in processes of "abstraction" and "generalization," through which the shared construct of the crisis becomes elaborated and refined into a new system of assumptions, expectations, and fantasies; this he calls the new family paradigm.

If Part I is the researcher's feast, Part II is the theorist's delight. Reiss describes how paradigms arise, develop, and change within families and how they regulate the family's relationship with its community. This is, he claims, "a new model." In my opinion, it is an exciting one that passes empirical tests beyond the reasonable expectation that we usually
