Family Support for the Elderly: The International Experience

*"Worldwide the family is the primary caregiver to the elderly.
This reality transcends culture, politics, and economic circumstances in spite of wide variation in the way care is provided in different societies."*

Family Support for the Elderly: The International Experience, Edited by Hal Kneidel, Akiko Hashimoto, and Larry C. Coggart, Oxford Medical Publications, 323 pp., £24.00.

This is one of the main conclusions of the editors of this first volume who present their readers with a landmark review of how families around the world play out their roles as caretakers of vulnerable older people. For the most part, family care is viewed as essential to the well being of the elderly—no viable alternative exists in much of the developing world and it provides an economical and often more acceptable choice in much of the more developed world.

Partially supported by the WHO Global Programme for Health of the Elderly and the Worldwide International Program on Health and Aging, the book seeks to broaden the knowledge base on families and the elderly particular in different countries—especially in the developing regions of the world—while drawing out common themes. The first of the book's two parts examines the broad forces shaping the experience of family support for elderly people—culture, demographics, economics and politics. The second and much larger part presents analyses of these forces as work in 21 countries representing a spectrum of cultural and economic diversity. The major English-speaking and European nations discussed in the volume range from the United States to Poland. From the Middle East and Africa come essays on Israel, Turkey and Ghana. Also included are discussions about the two most populous countries in Latin America, Mexico and Brazil. The nations of Asia and the Pacific are represented with chapters on Japan, China, India and a comparison of aging in Fiji, Korea, Malaysia, and the Philippines.

While the book focuses on the individuality of each nation's response, the editors draw on this rich store of information to identify general trends concerning the family's role in caring for its aging. Western families tend to organize along the lines of a "modified extended family, in which older couples and individual-people and have the means to live in their own dwellings, while maintaining close contact with other generations located nearby." Considerable care assistance for older people is available in the form of income, health care and institutions that help ease the caretaker responsibilities of the family. However, even among countries sharing these similarities there are "varying different combinations of formal and informal support ... according to climate, necessity, and resources."

For the most part, people in developing countries still rely on the extended family as their primary means of assistance in old age. This arrangement offers the benefits of "economics of scale in living costs . . .
(and) facilitates the roles of the aged as providers of child care and socialization and permits them to be involved with important family decisions." The prevalence of the extended family along with the limited availability of state support is a key to the differences separating the poorer and wealthier regions of the world.

In Scandinavia, economic resources combine with political will to make extensive social support services available. In those countries a high proportion of the frail elderly are either institutionalized or living alone largely thanks to the availability of extensive home nursing facilities. By contrast, in countries like India and Ghana, which have "about 2% of per capita GDP of Scandinavia . . . a social security system targeted to the elderly would be realistic." According to the
