Fall Of Tartarus:

The Fall of Tartarus Eric Brown, 2016 In myth Tartarus was the lowest region of hell In reality it is a world about to die I d heard many a tale about Tartarus Major how certain continents were technological backwaters five hundred years behind the times how the Church governed half the planet with a fist of iron and yet how across scattered islands and sequestered lands a thousand bizarre and heretic cults prospered too I d heard how a lone traveller was hardly safe upon the planet s surface prey to wild animals and cut throats Most of all I d heard that Tartarus was a dying world one that would be annihilated when its sun exploded in the magnificent stellar suicide of a supernova These are the stories of the people who are leaving Tartarus those have decided to stay and those who are arriving on the planet for the apocalypse This ebook edition also features an afterword by the author Eric Brown spins a terrific yarn SFX This is the rediscovery of wonder Stephen Baxter on HelixSF suffused with a cosmopolitan and literary sensibility Paul McAuley British writing with a deft understated touch wonderful New Scientist *Essay on Milton's English and versification. Traces of the Past Karen Bassi, 2016-08-17 What are we doing when we walk into an archaeological museum or onto an archaeological site What do the objects and features we encounter in these unique places mean and more specifically how do they convey to us something about the beliefs and activities of formerly living humans In short how do visible remains and ruins in the present give meaning to the human past Karen Bassi addresses these questions through detailed close readings of canonical works spanning the archaic to the classical periods of ancient Greek culture showing how the past is constituted in descriptions of what narrators and characters see in their present context She introduces the term protoarchaeological to refer to narratives that navigate the gap between linguistic representation and empirical observation between words and things in accessing and giving meaning to the past Such narratives invite readers to view the past as a receding visual field and in the process to cross the disciplinary boundaries that divide literature history and archaeology Aimed at classicists literary scholars ancient historians cultural historians and archaeological theorists the book combines three areas of research time as a feature of narrative structure in literary theory the concept of the past itself in the philosophy of history and the ontological status of material objects in archaeological theory Each of five central chapters explores how specific protoarchaeological narratives from the fate of Zeus stone in Hesiod s Theogony to the contest between words and objects in Aristophanes Frogs both expose and attempt to bridge this gap Throughout the book serves as a response to Herodotus task in writing the Histories namely to ensure that the past deeds of men do not fade with time Phaedo Plato, 1925 The Greek Classics: Philosophy , 1909 Theories of Weight in the Ancient World Denis O'Brien, 2016-06-21 Harvard
