and no inconsiderable share of learning and ingenuity employed by Biblical interpreters in ancient mediaeval and modern times in order to ascertain and exhibit its meaning From the commencement of our era at least no century has elapsed in which it has not in some shape been explained or commented on Jewish and Christian theologians in the east and in the west have offered in the form of commentary or paraphrase or translation interpretations of the passage according to their respective views while writers of history in the middle ages have embodied in their works a widely received version of the brief narrative which it contains The opinions which have been propounded on the subject are as might be expected various and the languages in which these have been expressed are many Hebrew Chaldee Syriac Ethiopic Arabic Greek Latin German French and English being included in the number The view which the present writer adopts from a full conviction that it is the only admissible one has been deemed not merely absurd but impious and heretical and is still regarded by many as at the least fanciful and by some it is to be believed with a feeling of aversion so strong that they avoid even an allusion to it no doubt lest they should appear to give it even a small measure of countenance The opinions entertained respecting the meaning of the passage by Jewish and Christian writers in ancient and mediaeval times as well as by the principal modern commentators are noticed in the following pages
