European Inflation Dynamics Jordi Galí, Mark Gertler, J. David López-Salido, 2001 We provide evidence on the fit of the New Phillips Curve NPQ for the Euro area over the period 1970 1998 and use it as a tool to compare the characteristics of European inflation dynamics with those observed in the U S We also analyze the factors underlying inflation inertia by examining the cyclical behavior of marginal costs as well as that of its two main components namely labor productivity and real wages Some of the findings can be summarized as follows a the NPC fits Euro area data very well possibly better than U S data b the degree of price stickiness implied by the estimates is substantial but in line with survey evidence and U S estimates c inflation dynamics in the Euro area appear to have a stronger forward looking component i e less inertia than in the U S d labor market frictions as manifested in the behavior of the wage markup appear to have played a key role in shaping the behavior of marginal costs and consequently inflation in Europe

Tax Policy, Venture Capital, and Entrepreneurship Christian Keuschnigg, Søren Bo Nielsen, 2000 The paper studies the effects of tax policy on venture capital activity

Entrepreneurs pursue a single high risk project each but have no own resources Financiers provide equity finance They must structure the entrepreneur s profit share and base salary to assure their incentives for full effort In addition to providing equity finance venture capitalists assist with valuable business advice to enhance survival rates Within a general equilibrium framework with a traditional and an entrepreneurial sector the paper investigates the effects of taxes on the equilibrium level of entrepreneurship and managerial advice It considers differential wage and capital income taxes a comprehensive income tax incomplete loss offset progressive taxation as well as investment and output subsidies to the entrepreneurial sector

Market Mechanisms for Policy Decisions Alessandra Casella,2001 The thesis of this paper is that more transparent rule bound and subtle mechanisms for policy coordination will be needed to ensure the success of an enlarged European Union A common policy is a public good with distributional implications Economists have developed a large number of plausible market mechanisms for the efficient provision of public goods and the European Union with its limited number of members and relative ease of information is a promising ground for such schemes An important open area of applied research is thus the tailoring of incentive schemes to the specific needs of the European Union and its policy choices The paper discusses two possible examples a system of tradable deficit permits to implement the fiscal constraints imposed by the Maastricht treaty and a rule allowing country representatives to shift their own votes intertemporally when deliberations are taken by vote in periodic committee meetings
