

Lodes of Gold in Hatcher Pass

Robert Hatcher discovered rich
gold-streaked quartz veins in the rugged Talkeetna Mountains 10 miles northwest of here in 1906. After additional discoveries, hard-rock mining propelled Hatcher Pass to second in production of lode gold in Alaska.

Seeking the Source

Prospectors discovered gold in the creeks at the foothills of the Talkeetna Mountains in 1907 and formed the Willow Creek Mining District a year later. While others worked the creek grounds, 26-year-old Robert Lee Hatcher, a veteran prospector from Texas, followed the trail of gold up the creeks looking for its source in hard-rock veins. In 1908, he staked a hard-rock gold claim on the east side of the pass that now bears his name.

Rich Enough?

In the following decade, other prospectors discovered more gold veins on the high ridges in the Hatcher Pass area. Contending with harsh weather and rugged terrain, they drove tunnels and did other backbreaking work to verify that their claims were rich enough to bet it in the expensive equipment necessary to mine and process ore. Trails and roads were built to haul the timbers and supplies to the mines. Finally, miners and investors consolidated claims and formed companies to mine the ore.

Going for the Lode

Lode mining in the Willow Creek district quickly overshadowed placer mining. By 1918, Hatcher Pass was the richest hard-rock area in Southcentral Alaska. The ore in some Hatcher Pass claims assayed ten times higher than ore at hard-rock mines in Southeast Alaska. Hatcher Pass production peaked in the 1920s. Total production is estimated at $23,874 ounces. Independence Mine State Historical Park is one of the few remaining examples of a large-scale lode mining operation in Hatcher Pass.
