Relationship of Metal Surfaces to Heat-aging Properties of Adhesive Bonds J. M. Black, R. F. Blomquist, 1958 A study was made to determine the probable causes of deterioration of each of several adhesives in bonds to stainless steel at temperatures from 400 to 550 degrees F Preliminary studies of aluminum surfaces on which ions of metals used in stainless steel were introduced showed that iron was probably catalyzing a thermal deterioration of the adhesive The resistance of FPL 878 adhesive to thermal deterioration at 550 degrees F on steel was improved significantly by treating the steel surface to be bonded with either zinc or cerium naphthenate and firing at 1 200 degrees F The addition of manganese dioxide to the adhesive also increased its resistance to thermal deterioration A study of the thermal aging properties of five different chemical types of adhesives on stainless steel and alumina revealed that a phenol nitrile rubber adhesive was superior to a phenol epoxy adhesive on steel but this order was reversed on alumina These and other observations indicated probable specific relationships among the chemical structure of the adhesive the metal adherend and the resultant thermal stability of bonds after aging at high temperatures Children's Books in Print, 2007 ,2006
