

Space walk

TRAVELLING INTO space poses many problems. First, extremely powerful rockets are needed to accelerate a spacecraft up into space and free it from Earth's gravity. Second, out in space, spacecraft must survive in an environment unlike any conditions on Earth. Third, distances in space are vast, so the spacecraft must take everything it needs for a very long journey. However, stations in space can help the craft along the way, and astronauts are given special equipment to help them survive without oxygen and in extreme temperatures.

A three-stage engine provides thrust after the solid rocket boosters have fallen away.

Launch tower

External tank contains liquid hydrogen fuel and liquid oxygen oxidiser to supply three space shuttle main engines during liftoff and ascent.

Two solid rocket boosters (SRBs) provide main thrust to lift space shuttle off pad and up to about 40 km, then drop away. They are called solid because they contain solid fuel.

Shuttle orbiter goes into space carrying fuel and astronauts, then returns to land like an aeroplane.

Space rockets

Huge rockets blast a spacecraft up and away from the Earth. But the rockets are not needed once the spacecraft is travelling fast enough to escape Earth's gravity, so they fall away in stages. At launch, the shuttle needs to be pushed and weighs 2,000 tonnes. Most of the lift now comes from the launch to leave the launch complex, which weighs 2,000 tonnes and is 100 m high. It is 100 m high to launch the shuttle.

Orbiter's three main engines fire at launch.

IT'S A FACT

- The space shuttle is the only spacecraft to orbit the Earth. It is the only spacecraft to orbit the Earth.
- There is no oxygen in space, so spacecraft must take everything they need for the journey.

International Space Station

The International Space Station is being assembled by astronauts in orbit. It is the largest man-made object in space. It is made up of many parts, including a central core, four long arms, and many other modules. It is the only man-made object in space that is not a satellite. It is the only man-made object in space that is not a satellite. It is the only man-made object in space that is not a satellite.

Backpack containing lithium hydroxide canisters to soak up astronaut's waste breath.

Multiple layers of air inflated to provide pressure to stop body fluids from boiling.

Multiple outer layers provide protection from micro-meteoroids.

Autonomous modules provide protection from radiation.

Oxygen supply through an umbilical cord from spacecraft.

Water supply inside suit maintains low temperature.

Light poly-carbonate helmet with anti-glare visor.

Special tapered joints allow astronaut to bend torso, arms, knees and ankles.

Inner layers of fabric keep astronaut warm.

WORK IT OUT

1. Future spacecraft may use sails to catch the solar wind - the stream of high-speed radiation from the Sun.

2. It would take nine months to reach our nearest planet, Mars.

Space wear

Outer space has very different conditions to those on Earth, and astronauts have to wear specially designed spacesuits in order to survive in space. Spacesuits not only provide astronauts with what they need for breathing, but also shield them against temperatures that vary from 120°C in the Sun to -100°C in the shade. Spacesuits have many layers to protect against cosmic rays and very fast particles of space dust called micro-meteoroids. The suits also create pressure to stop the astronaut's blood and body fluids boiling in the vacuum of space.
