1. PROJECTS, THE CATERING ROLE OF DEVELOPMENT

Projects are all-purpose agents of development. Perhaps the most obvious danger of project proliferation is the virtual abandonment of long-term, continuous implementation of development programs. Indeed, the very idea of a development project is problematic.

Project programming is almost identical with, or even is a synonym of, development in planning. Development is a continuous, dynamic, and changing process, involving growth, change, transformation, development, economic policy, political, and administrative structures, and all other things that are relevant to development. Development is a continuous, dynamic, and changing process, involving growth, change, transformation, development, economic policy, political, and administrative structures, and all other things that are relevant to development. Development is a continuous, dynamic, and changing process, involving growth, change, transformation, development, economic policy, political, and administrative structures, and all other things that are relevant to development.

It is a danger, therefore, that project programming will become a mere administrative tool, rather than a development planning process. Development is a continuous, dynamic, and changing process, involving growth, change, transformation, development, economic policy, political, and administrative structures, and all other things that are relevant to development. Development is a continuous, dynamic, and changing process, involving growth, change, transformation, development, economic policy, political, and administrative structures, and all other things that are relevant to development.

What is a Project?

In the United States, the word "project" has long been used to describe a development or production activity, such as a construction project, a research project, or a development project. The word "project" is used to describe a development or production activity, such as a construction project, a research project, or a development project.
