

Film Distribution: Our Definitive Guide To Movie Distribution

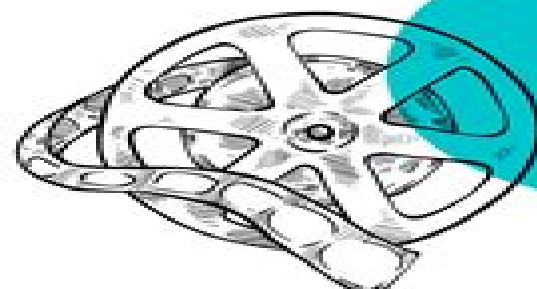

1. What Does A Film Distributor Do?

Film distribution is the process of making a movie available for viewing by an audience. And this includes theatrical exhibition, TV broadcast, VOD streaming, and DVD sales.

When you find a film distributor, you will sign a contract with them. This film distribution contract will include a term length, which outlines how long the distributor will have the rights to your film. Keep in mind that these term lengths tend to be high (10-15 years).

2. Contacting Film Distributors

There are different types of film distributors. Some only release major budget, feature films while others focus on specific genres or cater to niche audiences. When making a film, you should have an idea of who your target audience is. When finding a distributor, your goal is to work with someone who has sold similar projects (for example: the same genre, budget, target audience, and language).

3. Distribution Screenings

The distribution screenings are the final stage in determining if a film will be accepted into a festival. They involve presenting the film to a small audience and gauging their reactions.
