Opportunities and Challenges

Nuclear Medicine (NM) and Artificial Intelligence (AI) together empower medical doctors for more effective patient management and better outcome. Nuclear medicine provides non-invasive, quantitative information on physiology and signalling that is essential to interpret for understanding diseases and assigning appropriate therapies.

This information is amended by morphological information in the context of hybrid anatomico-metabolic imaging that has become prevalent today through SPECT/CT, PET/CT and PET/MR imaging. Moreover, additional clinical and non-clinical information is included in medical decision making, thus calling for a highly integrative data analysis.

This analysis is supported more and more by AI algorithms to help the medical professionals see through the multiplexed attributes of their patients, attributes of patients or study subjects. We, as Nuclear Medicine Europe, support the adoption of AI in the context of routine NM applications and future derivatives in tracer development, drug candidate selection, NM imaging and therapy decision making.

Notably, AI comes with a number of promises and caveats alike.
