In this article, the researchers conduct a non-systematic literature review to explore preliminary and anecdotal evidence regarding the effects of youth crisis intervention teams (CITs) on deinstitutionalization, criminalization, and deviant behaviors in young people with mental and psychiatric issues. As an intervention, youth CITs in the U.S. are programs that adapt the adult CIT model to adolescent populations and are based on partnerships between mental health and law enforcement agencies, enabling communities to refer delinquent young people to relevant services. As per the source, the intervention's feasibility and relevance to addressing homelessness among mentally unstable young people are unknown due to the lack of evidence from controlled research. Even anecdotal evidence from some U.S. states, including Illinois, Texas, Colorado, and Tennessee, does not suggest the strategy's tangible effects on homelessness rates among young people with mental health issues, thus revealing a huge research gap. As for ethical considerations, age-specific neurodevelopmental characteristics might contribute to misdiagnosis cases, thus creating a situation in which police officers in youth CIT programs mistake adjustment issues or some psycho-emotional changes during adolescence for serious mental disorders.

The authors use a quantitative survey study to assess the effects of a nationwide care coordination intervention for American adults who are homeless or face housing instability and are diagnosed with addiction or mental health disorders.
