Today more and more patients are influenced by such cults and it is careful to have easily available knowledge of them when practising psychotherapy.

Psychology for Nurses. JENNIFER M. JARVIS and JOSEF GIBSON. Fourth Edition. Oxford: Blackwell Scientific Publications. 1977. Pp 148. £3.25.

With its 148 pages this little book, first published in 1961, has a big task. It does not accomplish it successfully.

Its purpose is not clearly stated in the text, but may be surmised from the sentence on the back cover: it 'will enable her (the nurse) to appreciate the psychological processes in her patients and the applications of psychology to nursing, medicine, learning and work'. I doubt it.

Faced with the task of having to exclude large tracts of their subject field, the authors had to decide what in psychology was likely to be of most relevance to working as a nurse. I cannot believe that this is what they actually did. They show no awareness of what information from psychology might make the nurse more sensitive, insightful and effective in his or her job. In the absence, apparently, of any analysis of that job and therefore of any principles for selecting appropriate material, they seem to have picked, virtually at random, a number of topics, the majority of which are treated so superficially as to be largely meaningless.

Nurses are front-line therapists, no matter in what kind of hospital they work. They are offered nothing here to support them in this major role. No psychological studies of the patient-nurse or patient-doctor relationship are mentioned; not even studies of patients' response to surgery in relation to simple pre-operative interventions in the form of discussion, advice and instruction. Since nurses are inevitably potent behaviour modifiers, one might have expected a little more on this topic than the fourteen lines popped in at the end of the chapter on mental retardation. Eighteen lines are accorded to 'Theories of learning' ('trial and error', 'insight', and 'conditioning'), 7 of which go to Kohler's observations on the chimpanzee solving problems by 'insight'. No attempt is made to relate learning to psychological treatment processes, with the exception of the rather dubious illustration of the use of apomorphine in the treatment of alcoholic addiction. A whole chapter is devoted to social psychology; but nothing is said about the numerous American studies of social learning and modelling, especially in children, nor about Angyle's important work on social skills. On the other hand, ten pages are devoted to the description (albeit very sketchily) of a haphazard and unrepresentative collection of psychological tests, only perhaps two of which are likely to be used by a nurse. About two pages are given to the Illinois Test of Psycholinguistic Ability: why? Any nurse reading this Appendix could be forgiven for dismissing psychological tests as incomprehensible or useless or both.

Apart possibly from the four chapters on medicine and psychology (particularly Chapter 9 on brain structure and function) and the last two on psychology in education and industry, the book is nothing but a concatenation of clichés, glimpses of the obvious ('Blindness in one eye breeds a fear of harm to the other, . . . ' p. 84, line 31), and sometimes impenetrable obscurities: what, for example, will the reader in his or her first year in nursing make of 'But behind all this, hidden from our consciousness by a curtain that is only occasionally and then jerkily and briefly drawn aside, is the unconscious mind, of whose existence we are consciously unaware?' (Page 59, lines 4 to 7).

To conclude: this is the fourth edition of a book that first appeared 27 years ago. It does a good deal less than flatter the intelligence of the students for whom it is intended; it is, I believe, downright misleading. I am amazed that any publisher should be so badly advised by his editors as to reissue it now.

Handbook of Psychiatry for Social Workers and Health Visitors. By CHARLES BAGG. London: Constable. 1977. Pp 438. £9.00.

Dr Bagg has attempted to provide a handbook that will be equal value to both social workers and health visitors. In some 400 pages he covers the major psychiatric disorders of both child and adulthood, the medical, community and administrative processes for their alleviation and the social worker's functions in the disorders he describes. Less attention is devoted to the specific functions of the health visitor—the author remaining content to equate the roles of these two helping professionals in most instances. Inevitably, there are many difficulties inherent in attempt-
