

How to Design a Wildlife Garden

High mounds: These will add excitement and opportunity for the other structural systems as well as creating diverse habitats. The mounds will host many varying habitats including woodland, meadow, scrub as well as numerous nesting burrows and hollows.

Dry stone walls: These will either be built in a traditional dry stone wall way or built with gabions filled with rocks. These rock walls will act as a retaining structure at the base of the mounds. This will warm up quickly in the sun as well as provide rocks and crevices. These will be perfect nesting opportunities for small mammals, insects, birds especially reptiles.

Sandy heath: By using the microclimate created by the south side of the mounds which heat up in the sun, by definition these areas are already heavily species rich require warm environments for toadstools and the common lizard will flourish and even more than Wild flower meadow: These will be planted with native wild flowers (the focus is on those much of this is will provide perfect

Shrubland: These are low lying shrubland trees that cover the area adjacent to the larger garden for opportunities for small mammals

Wildlife Pond: The existing wildlife pond will be enclosed by a stone wall. A heavy duty rubber liner will be installed. The edges will be planted with native marginal plants. The west side will allow the flow of water.

Ecological planting: These areas will be planted with a variety of native plants, shrubs, trees and off the site and possible food and a

Long grass: Long grass will be left off wildlife species, especially the life cycle
