Deduction Rules

A good reader is like a good listener. They are details that others miss. To gain a good mark in the part of the essay, you must explore the text in great detail - almost forensic like - and pick out and examine the small but significant details. Writers don't always tell the reader everything, they sometimes leave clues instead. The best readers are the ones that can spot the clues and explain their significance.

You may have noted the phrase "leading between the lines." Do you know what it means?

If you read between the lines, you understand what someone really means, or what is really happening in a situation, even though it is not said openly. The Japanese is better at this, as it does in life. People don't always say what they mean. A good reader will use this and be able to work out the subtext.

How have the two developing nations differed? Take a look at the two cities.

Look at the image below closely. Using only details visible in the picture, answer the questions.

- What is happening?
- What is the man standing up?
- What is he doing? Why?
- What is under the chair?
- What time is it in?
- How do you know?
- Is this thing going today?
- What year, roughly, do you think it is? (Looking over screen)

- What is the mood of the image?
- How is the mood created?
- That's unusual about the setting and the subject?
- Why do you think he is performing an ignorant stand?

Answers 1–10

It seems to be operating on a body. He is a doctor or scientist. He is performing surgery. The 'patient' is a young man – his skin looks youthful. He is dead – indicated by his hair being covered. The setting is not modern. Based on the man's clothing and the look of modern machinery, it could be set in the Victorian age.

The mood is dark and foreboding. The mood is created through the use of dark, moody colors, a lack of light and the expressions on the doctor's face. It's assumed that an operation would be performed alone in a dark room. This suggests that the doctor is operating in secret and that what he's doing is wrong and possibly illegal.
