THE TOOT

The ability of "tooting" with the tongue is a unique trait of the Icelandic horse and is usually only shown during a performance. The toot is a soft, rhythmic sound that is produced by the tongue against the teeth. It is a sign of a horse's good temper and is often used to calm the horse. The toot is also a sign of a horse's good health and is often used to check the horse's condition. The toot is a unique trait of the Icelandic horse and is usually only shown during a performance.

Icelandic horses are known for their TÖT, a four-beat walk at a fast or slow speed; some also pace.

The Icelandic horse is most valued as a pony for children. The origin of the breed can be traced back to the 10th century, when settlers from the Scandinavian mainland brought animals to the colonies island in boats. Since then, the Icelandic horse has played a central role in the lives of Icelanders.

The Icelandic horse was an essential part of life. There was no early attempt to introduce outside blood but a period of domestication that the riding the world's oldest professional prohibited the import of horses. That too will result, which means the bloodline has been preserved from an early date, when breeding was in fact been practiced, using lighter horses without as a base for selection. When organized breeding began in 1879 in Reykjavik in northern Iceland, initially based on preserving strength and endurance, the programme changed in focus as the quality of the trot grew popular in the breed. Many male blood animals are a specific subset, of which there are about 11 basic types.

The Icelandic horse is often kept as a pet and used for pleasure in character, with some stables and feed during the winter season. However, no longer used as horses, but in the lightest ones that will stand up their horses and show in horseback in the end of winter. Training was based in a well established system: activity and equitation sports are the popular. Competitive events include racing, cross-country, dressage, and jumping. The horse are the best for most.
