

Designing for dynamic diversity: Representing various senior citizens in digital information sources

Eugene Loos*

*University of Amsterdam / ASCoR, Netherlands

Abstract

This article discusses how we can ensure that various senior citizens (women and men, living alone or together, full of vitality or in fragile health, coming from different cultural backgrounds) can identify with images representing themselves so they continue to have access to information sources in our digitising information society. First, the role of two discourse coalitions, the eternally youthful seniors towards and the frail needy seniors in the Netherlands will be discussed. Then, a case study of the websites of the three senior citizens' organisations in the Netherlands which will be used to answer the question to what extent these organisations represent their various members in their use of images of eternally youthful or frail needy seniors and if they are represented as a homogeneous or diverse group. Finally, the article will answer the question how creative use can be made of the various images of senior citizens following the principle of "designing for dynamic diversity" to achieve an accessible homepage.

Keywords: digitising information society, information accessibility, senior citizens, discourse coalitions, identification, designing for diversity.

Introduction¹

In the majority of the western countries the population is ageing at a rapid pace. At the same time, society is increasingly becoming more digitalised. Information is supplied to a growing extent, and frequently solely, in digital form. It is obvious, that this trend poses dangers for people, like senior citizens, who have problems using such new media. They risk being excluded from crucial information (Duime1, 2007, p. 7). Digital information, therefore, has to be accessible for senior citizens, but it is often defined too narrowly. So, the Stichting Accessibility [Dutch Accessibility Foundation] (2010, p. 7) defines web accessibility as the 'usability of the internet', applying criteria such as keyboard accessibility and font size scalability. In my opinion, however, digital information accessibility is determined by factors other than these alone. I therefore advocate the use of a more dynamic concept than the limited technological interpretation usually applied to the access to information, especially where a new medium like websites is concerned. Organisations could strive for 'dynamic diversity' in designing their information sources (Gregor et al., 2002). We must not only take into account such trends in our information society as digitisation and
