

« La maladie d'Alzheimer et les syndromes apparentés (c'est-à-dire les autres causes de démences, essentiellement) sont devenus un problème majeur de santé publique en France et sont en passe de devenir, enfin, une priorité, en raison du vieillissement de la population. L'épidémiologie de ces affections est un des éléments essentiels pour la décision en santé publique et pour la connaissance de ces maladies et de leurs déterminants. Selon les estimations les plus raisonnables, il y aurait actuellement en France environ 850 000 cas de maladie d'Alzheimer et syndromes apparentés, et environ 220 000 nouveaux cas par an. Les progrès de la prise en charge font que la durée de la maladie augmente, ainsi que le nombre des malades. En dehors du développement d'un traitement curatif bien peu probable à court terme, seule une politique de prévention devrait permettre de contenir l'accroissement de ce nombre dans un proche avenir. Quatre pistes de prévention sont crédibles : les facteurs de risques cardiovasculaire, notamment l'hypertension artérielle ; la nutrition ; les activités stimulantes et physiques ; l'équilibre affectif et social. »

La maladie d'Alzheimer et les syndromes apparentés sont devenus un problème majeur de santé publique en France ; l'objectif de cet article est de présenter les estimations les plus fiables de prévalence, incidence et durée de la démence, de proposer des projections pour un proche avenir, et de faire le point sur les pistes de prévention possibles.

Prévalence et incidence de la maladie

Estimation de la prévalence

La majorité des cas de démences se rencontre après 65 ans, et même après 75 ou 80 ans. Ce sont ces cas, nombreux, qui constituent un réel problème de santé publique : les données épidémiologiques seront donc présentées uniquement pour ces tranches d'âges.

La maladie existe pourtant avant 65, et même avant 60 ans ; si, individuellement, une maladie survenant précocement est tragique, ces démences précoces représentent en revanche une faible proportion de cas. Pour ces cas plus jeunes, les problèmes posés sont différents de ceux rencontrés pour les cas plus âgés, et nous ne disposons pas de données épidémiologiques vraiment fiables. Des estimations réalisées par le groupe Eurodem (réunissent les données de plusieurs études de cohortes européennes) en 1991 donnaient une prévalence de démence de 0,5 % chez les femmes et 1,6 % chez les hommes entre 40 et 64 ans, et de 0,1 % chez les femmes et 0,2 % chez les hommes avant 60 ans [1], soit une estimation de 32 000 personnes de moins de 65 ans présentant une démence en 2004, en France. Ces démences précoces sont le plus souvent diagnostiquées et médicalisées, même si l'on peut supposer que le délai est parfois long (ce qui n'est pas le cas des démences plus tardives), en raison de la rareté de survenue dans cette tranche d'âge. Pour ces cas précoces, le problème principal est le manque de structures adaptées pour prendre en charge ces sujets relativement jeunes.
