

Seat too light. The horse's weight is upon the rider's hands, and the rider is jumping on the reins.

Seat too heavy. The horse is half sitting.

The Aids

The natural aids — the legs, hands, body-weight and voice of the rider — can be picked up by artificial aids from time to time if needed. There is also the horse's natural communication system. The rider must consciously teach his horse what response he expects of him, and to do this he must be consistent; for example it would be very confusing to us if we were taught on Monday that two plus two equal five, and on Thursday that it equals three! This would be illogical and wrong. Thus the rider must be clear in his mind what aid he is giving for a particular response, and then be diligent in giving the same on each time.

Communicating with the Horse

Contact

The whole communication system between a rider and his horse depends on the rider's ability to take a contact, maintain it, and use it effectively. By contact, I mean two things. First, the rider must be able to sit in such a way that his legs can wrap themselves round the horse, thus giving maximum contact with his body. Second, he must be able to hold the reins so that he maintains a constant elastic tension between his hands and the horse's mouth. This contact puts the horse in a position where he can best listen to the aids he is given. He is then between the leg and hand of the rider.

Maintaining contact correctly takes time to achieve as it is a sensitive matter and one that the rider has to learn to feel. His legs must be there, but should not be used in order to grip himself onto the saddle, and his hands must not be used to balance. Developing a correct position in the saddle will prevent this from happening.

Coordination

People vary enormously in their ability to coordinate mind and body. Natural flow is a big advantage and will make the task easier, and those who are fortunate enough to possess it will automatically use their seat, legs and hands in such a way that there are not in opposition to each other. By this I mean that if the seat and legs ask the horse to go forwards, the hands must allow him to do so and should not prevent him, as so often happens. In fact it seems to be quite a common occurrence that the rider's seat, legs and hands give opposing messages, and although unintentional, this is very confusing for the horse. Every rider should give this matter a great deal of thought, especially if his horse is not doing what he wants.

In more advanced disciplines, coordination is the rule because even more vital to the horse is being asked to do one thing closely followed by another. In dressage competitions or when jumping a course of fences, this matters a great deal. A lack of coordination can be felt in several ways:

- Difficulty in achieving a movement.
- Resistance by the horse.
- The rider's lack of balance in the saddle and dependence on the reins for support.
- The horse's lack of balance due to inconsistent seat position or loss of true contact altogether, or the rider's incorrect position.
