Functional Illiteracy And Literacy Provision In Developed Countries:

Functional Illiteracy and Literacy Provision in Developed Countries Elisabeth Fuchs-Brüninghoff, Wolfgang Kreft, Ulrike Kropp, 1986 It was not until the end of the 1970s that public debate on the problem of functional illiteracy among adults began in the Federal Republic of Germany FRG Even afterward Germans were reluctant to admit that illiteracy was a problem in their country Literacy education efforts began at the local level and the first national conference on adult literacy was held in Bremen in 1981 After increasing focus on the relationship between illiteracy and unemployment German adult educational institutions began to respond to specific educational needs As a result literacy instruction is now offered by almost 280 adult educational institutions The development of literacy education in the FRG can be divided into experimental consolidation and transition phases Since the late 1970s literacy provision has grown rapidly although significant differences still exist between program offerings in rural and urban areas A qualitative improvement in the respect accorded to conditions for illiterate individuals has accompanied this growth in literacy instruction The following program elements may be said to characterize adult literacy programs in the FRG contact to students initial advice to students consideration of the learning situation of illiterate adults development of specific methods of teaching reading and writing and provision of sociopedagogical support and counseling Efforts are underway to expand the areas served by literacy programs integrate numeracy and other basic skills into literacy programs and improve existing programs through a research and development effort 141 references in English and German MN
