These findings indicate that the two different types of stressors (i.e., acute and chronic) have different effects on the immune system. The acute stressors (i.e., the two types of acute stressors) have a more immediate effect on the immune system, while the chronic stressors (i.e., the two types of chronic stressors) have a more long-term effect on the immune system. The findings also suggest that the immune system is more sensitive to acute stressors than to chronic stressors.
