J. Price Gillingham

Executive Director, Institute for Development Studies

The World Bank

1988

I. PROJECTS, THE CATCHING UP OF DEVELOPMENT

Projects are the instruments of development. Perhaps the best reason for this is because, although agricultural development is a long-term process, agricultural development projects are short-term projects. They are designed to be completed in a few years, and their results are visible and measurable.

Project preparation is closely related with agricultural operations in development. It is a process of identifying agricultural development opportunities, identifying projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects. It is a process of identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects. It is a process of identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects.

It is a process of identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects. It is a process of identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects. It is a process of identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects.

What is a Project?

The Institute for Development Studies suggests the concept of agricultural development projects as a process of identifying agricultural development opportunities, identifying projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects. It is a process of identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects. It is a process of identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects, and identifying the resources needed to carry out the projects.
