

- Consider first the gender gap in command over property.
- We know that a critical distinction between many employers and employees is that the former command property and the latter typically do not. We also know that for millions in developing countries the ownership of productive assets is crucially linked to viable livelihoods; to a lower risk of poverty; to access to credit; and to a greater ability to bargain for higher wages. Economists have also long emphasized the importance of property rights for incentives and efficiency.
- These links are well recognized at the household level. But few have examined them in relation to gender. As I have argued in my book A Field of One's Own and elsewhere, inequality in command over property is the single most important form of persisting economic inequality between women and men. This impinges centrally on their status both as workers and as social and political actors.
- What I have in mind, however, is not the narrowly legalistic(教条主义的) way in which many think of property rights. Command over property implies not just rights in law, but also effective rights in practice. In many countries, for instance, even where inheritance laws are gender equal,
