

The incorporation of gender considerations into urban agriculture research is increasing, and indeed, there have been advances over the last decade in our understanding of both men's and women's experiences with farming in cities around the world. There is a move away from the so-called "urban farmer", an undifferentiated, masculine, normalised urban dweller who engages in agriculture. Instead, there is greater recognition that people's experiences with urban agriculture cannot be easily standardised and that gender neutrality does not necessarily capture the breadth of such experiences.

Gender Considerations for Urban Agriculture Research

Many researchers have begun to emphasise differences amongst urban farmers, thus highlighting the distinct agriculture systems that form along gender, race, ethnicity, class, age, etc. lines. The recognition of context-specificity and distinct standpoints provides greater scope and richness to research. Recognising differences amongst urban agriculture practitioners avoids a single conceptualisation of the needs, to opportunities, and resources as based on local perceptions of masculinity and femininity. Gender relations reflect the continual interaction and (re-)negotiation between men and women regarding their respective roles and responsibilities.

Gender as an analytical category fails to capture this as it is not only a social process with its own intricately linked with power relations. Gender analysis involves the examination of men's and women's roles, responsibilities, and social status in relation to cultural perceptions of masculinity and femininity (CCIC 1991, Fildes et al. 1996, 1999, Fuchs 1995, Osofsky et al. 1991, The man-Slayer et al. 1995, Womank, et al. 1997). To this end, gender analysis allows us to disaggregate data on urban agriculture and to explore why certain processes and structures generate different opportunities and constraints for different people (Hewitt 1998).

GENDER FRAMEWORK
The incorporation of a gender framework into urban agriculture research involves a two-tiered process of gender-disaggregated data collection, as well as gender interpretation and analysis.

First, researchers must collect information on the different experiences, needs, interests, and access to opportunities and resources of both men and women so as to establish an accurate picture of the local context. This stage of the research aims to answer the questions: who, what, when, where, and how urban agriculture systems function with regard to gender dynamics.

Second, researchers must ask why such gender dynamics occur. It is not enough to document differences; rather, researchers must probe deeper and examine the factor with an create and influence differential opportunities and constraints for men and women at the local, regional and global level.

It is important to make clear the need for a two-tiered gender framework, for while urban agriculture literature contributes

It is not enough to document the differences

Interests, and experiences of persons. In this context, gender becomes a theoretical, analytical, and methodological tool through which to better understand the dynamics of urban agriculture systems.

Gender is the socio-cultural construction of roles and relationships between men and women. The assigned roles and relative position of men and women in a society delineate access
