Generating Internationally Comparable Income Distribution Estimates Ilo348:

Books in Print Supplement, 1984 Generating Internationally Comparable Income Distribution Estimates Wouter van Ginneken, Jong-goo Park, Chong-goo Park, 1984 ILO pub WEP pub Comparison of income distribution estimates for fifteen developing countries and eight developed countries discusses calculation methodology based on total household income per head includes summaries of country case studies from which estimates were calculated References and statistical tables

Some are More Equal Than Others Zsolt Darvas, 2016 We compare four methodologies to estimate the global distribution of income and find that many methods work well but the method based on two parameter distributions is more accurate than other methods is method is simpler easier to implement and relies on a more internationally comparable dataset of national income distributions than other approaches used in the literature to calculate the global distribution of income We suggest a simulation based technique to estimate the standard error of the global Gini coefficient Global income inequality among the citizens of 128 countries gradually declined in 1989 2013 largely due to convergence of income per capita which was offset by a small degree the increase in within country inequalities the standard error of the global Gini coefficient is very small After 1994 market income inequality in the EU28 was at a level similar to market inequality in other parts of the world but net inequality after taxes and transfers is at a much lower level and it declined between 1994 and 2008 since when it remained relatively stable Regional income inequality is much higher in Asia Africa the Commonwealth of Independent states and Latin America than in the EU28 In Asia regional inequality has increased recent years while it declined in the other three non European regions
