making gender a marker of the permeable boundaries between ideology and mythology" (281).

In Beyond Communication, Bogdan presents a feminist analysis of Canadian author Sinclair Ross's short story, "The Painted Door," in which she points out the story's patriarchal implications (150-154). In Bogdan's ideological interpretation of the story, the sexual agency of a female protagonist is blamed for the death of her husband and results in a burden of guilt for the woman. Tragic events result from opening the Pandora's box of female sexuality. Thus female independence and sexuality are dealt a blow by patriarchy. In this view, the story would be problematic for many readers. I find this aspect of Bogdan's analysis understandable and valid from a feminist point of view, though I would offer an alternative interpretation from a Jungian perspective.

Bogdan also goes on to refer to Robert Scholes' description of the patriarchal nature of narrative itself due to its structure of delayed gratification (186). She cites Teresa de Lauretis, a film theorist, who presents a feminist critique rooted in Freudian psychoanalytic principles. She argues "triumphantly that the thrust toward fulfillment of desire by way of progression from beginning, middle, to a climactic end, wherein the hero's sense of loss is restored by a renewed vision of how things are, is a male paradigm" (186). Bogdan also concludes that narrative form is itself inherently patriarchal (187), a position that I find problematic. Bogdan asserts that this realization dissolves the hierarchical relationship between mythology and ideology because "the genderization of narrative form renders mythology itself ideological" (187). So Bogdan first presents an ideological critique of the story and then secondly goes on to declare that the narrative form itself is patriarchal. The combination of two moves, but especially the second, seems to invalidate other perspectives and to position Frye's desire to separate myth and ideology as an unacceptable patriarchal viewpoint.

Bogdan is obviously not the only critic of Frye, and feminism not the only postmodern ideological perspective from which to criticize him. I will now briefly introduce two other relevant postmodern critiques of Frye. I do so to illustrate the degree to which Frye has been marginalized and to investigate how Jung's archetypal theories might respond to some valid concerns of postmodernism as well as to Bogdan specifically. In an article entitled "Frye's place in Contemporary Cultural Studies," Hayden White conveys concern from another perspective:

Contemporary practitioners of what has come to be called 'cultural studies' have not on the whole found much of use in Frye's work. In part that is because cultural studies is a neo-Marxist activity...and parasitically hostile to anything smacking of formalism, structuralism, idealism, or organicism. Insofar, then, as
