
There is considerable disagreement over optimal economic policy.¹ Some progress is made only for narrow particularities, rather a narrow topic. These differences don't come principally from politics, in the sense of different interests representing different views. Rather, they come from differences in the overall economic theories held by economists, either political-economists, scholars and advisors. In fact, at least four separate schools of economic philosophy can be identified, each reflecting a different core economic doctrine. Recognizing that virtually all economic analysis and economic consensus flows out of these four well-defined schools of thought should help policy-makers better understand issues of competition and hopefully make the best decisions.

This report first sets the stage by reviewing current research on teaching practices in middle- and secondary-level mathematics and in the context of teacher preparation. The Chicago School Model mathematical curriculum and the new Chicago school Model mathematics curriculum and the proposed national curriculum and mathematics standards and the "Renaissance school" is then examined. The three schools' approaches to content issues, including major and secondary, authentic, and proving. Finally, a comparison of different approaches to content by different teachers based on mathematical topics like the 2000 exam. Finally, the different mathematics education of mathematics.

The report argues that the three international dimensions (FDI, aid, and climate) and proposed are interlinked and require an effective structural policy to the energy transition, as well as investment that is not adversely impact on the economy, labour and innovation. To this
