

Interrelation and Interdependence of Freedom, Responsibility, and Accountability

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Humanity has always known that there is an invisible but great connection between responsibility and freedom. Personal freedom is limited by the need to be held accountable for the actions committed. However, too much responsibility and too little freedom make a person unhappy. There must be, therefore, a balance between freedom and responsibility for human happiness. Understanding how freedom, responsibility, and accountability are interconnected helps people become the best version of themselves.

Interaction of Three Elements

The terms 'accountability' and 'responsibility' are often used synonymously, but there is a difference in their meanings. Accountability is what happens after a situation has already occurred. When this term is used, it refers to how one perceives the results of their activities. Responsibility is an ongoing obligation to perform a specific action or refrain from performing it. These three elements are in a state of interdependence with each other.

Accountability to Others as an Opportunity to Find Inner Freedom

Although sometimes it seems that when being in a state of duty to other people, a person loses their freedom, this is not the case. This state helps one to follow a strictly marked path. In this way, a person can establish remarkably trusting relationships with others. The interaction of freedom and accountability mainly has only positive sides in the context of communication between people.
