Primed by greater than normal winter snow amounts in late 2007 and a generally wet spring in 2008 many locations in Illinois Indiana Iowa Missouri South Dakota and Wisconsin experienced record flooding in June 2008 following heavy rain from late May into early June Major flooding occurred at many other locations in these states Flooding also affected Kansas Michigan Minnesota Nebraska and Oklahoma In all 143 National Weather Service NWS river forecast locations experienced major flooding with 73 of these locations establishing records Large areas of the central United States were devastated The Federal Emergency Management Agency issued numerous Disaster Declarations Although the 2008 flooding event was less severe than that in 1993 which brought devastating flooding to the area significant portions of the region were hit much harder in 2008 The damage affected the lives and livelihoods of many people in many communities sometimes catastrophically Eleven people in six states lost their lives as a direct result of the flooding eight of those deaths were vehicle related Flooding inflicted major damage on residences agriculture businesses public services and transportation Section 2 Reports indicate damages of more than 5 billion Given the severity and wide geographic coverage of the flooding the NWS formed a 10 member Service Assessment Team to evaluate NWS products and services during the event The Service Assessment Team documented the event across the extensive geographic area affected The team focused its on site assessment of NWS products and services on Iowa as representative of overall products and services throughout the affected area Flash flooding and severe weather were not part of the assessment Areas of particular focus for the team included usefulness of the tools and data in the forecast process collaboration among the NWS the United States Geological Survey USGS and the United States Army Corps of Engineers USACE in the forecast process accuracy and effectiveness of service and societal perceptions From August 18 29 2008 team members assessed damage areas and interviewed many people in Iowa Minnesota and Illinois Staff members of several NWS forecast offices and key customers and partners were interviewed including local emergency management offices flood and levee district offices television stations and commercial and institutional entities Visits were also made to offices of the USGS and USACE Weather Forecast Office Binghamton, New York Flash Flood Climatology Christopher M. Gitro, 2012 Using the local Weather Forecast Office WFO Binghamton BUFKIT model sounding archive North American Mesoscale Model NAM and step mountain eta coordinate model ETA proximity soundings were analyzed using data interpolated to the forecast point closest to the initial report of flooding Several variables were investigated to help establish values characteristic of each flash flood type Results indicate Synoptic flash flood producing environments were most common however these events were associated with the widest range of parameter values examined in this study Meanwhile events with weak large scale forcing such as Meso High and Frontal flash flood scenarios were less common and were accompanied by a smaller range of parameter values prior to flood occurrence Furthermore results of this study suggest that some of the thresholds for the Binghamton area may be different than thresholds determined in previous studies for other parts of the country Abstract
