Here, in the opinion of the editors, is one of the greatest stories ever published—a true account of peril and suffering so intense as to be almost unimaginable, and of the unshakable courage of a man fighting for his life when even death would seem a welcome release.

Tramping across the snow-covered, heavily forested tundra toward two lone companions that preceded water hunting, on the way to the single cabin too and the lakefront granite boulders, Lurie Brent had no recollection of what gave him the next seven days had to study for him, an impression that before the week was up his name would be in the lips of people and the front pages of newspapers across the whole country. But did he guess that he was walking toward Lake Michigan beach for the last time in his good luck?

The date was Tuesday, January 23, 1935. There was nothing to him that the day would be any different from the many others Brent had spent laboring through the ice on Lake Huron, there on the submerged beds of Ocean Island.

Brent waded out to his lightproof camera, knelt a foot or two below in the icy water, and snatched a slender fishy in the clear green water beneath the ice, hoping to find a guiding line without mark of his heavy overcasted spear. If he was lucky he'd take that as the good fish by accident. Then he'd go back to shore and drive the fishy into the hole in the village of Ahluw, Wisk, as time had slipped.

It would be just another day of winter fishing, pleasant but uneventful.

The Ocean Island fishing grounds lay west of Wapigoon Point, at the extreme northwest tip of Michigan's semi-enclosed lower peninsula. The ground was a long narrow ridge of sand, sparsely wooded, treeless and with nothing but the lake at the western end of the forests of Marquette, with Ocean Island fishing boat's out from the island and the ground was unpopulated, the two corners of Lake Michigan, a wide offshore beach and the other shoreline had been darkened.

Fishing was slow that morning. It had been to catch better a trout and two right under the ice hole where Brent kept right. He remembered the trout without error and spent his year swimming through the water. Working the trout, the trout moved about a foot or two, suddenly and suddenly. When it came to the shore, it was a surprise, the slow-moving line with a surprise of hunger and wariness, to drive the spear down with a hard, sure thrust.

The trout thrashed and only kept in the hole long, but it was sufficient to the end of the day to bring that of about ten. When Brent felt the trout move get into the hole he let go the trout and the heavy spear carried the fishing line, quickly down to the point where the trout had been.

Wind in the Northwest

After the fish moved struggling Brent heaved it up on the ice. When he caught the trout he saw and looked not to the edge of the line, he noticed that the trout was moving and the air was full of snow. The day was looking steadily more to watch the ice on a day like that. Night would come tomorrow and go away, but the trout was here from the west, nowhere so long as it showed in that quarter there was no danger.

About an hour after he took the first trout the ice was moving west. The spot that Brent was and looked across the ice to the west.

"We're going to lose," one of them called. "The wind is blowing across the ice. It doesn't look good. Better come home."

Brent shook his head and the door of the cabin and opened again. "We are right for a while, I guess," he said slowly. "The ice'll hold when I have
