10.1 Introduction

This section explains how solar energy determines the basic pressure belts of the world. In particular, the section describes how energy in the atmosphere is transferred. The section also considers the energy balance of the earth's atmosphere system and the forces behind atmospheric and oceanic circulation.

10.2 Objectives

- (i) To explain how solar energy is transferred through the atmosphere.
- (ii) To describe latitudinal differences in global solar energy and how this relates to atmospheric and oceanic circulations.
- (iii) To illustrate how atmospheric and oceanic circulation determines local weather conditions as well as the entire pattern of global climates.

10.3 Energy in the atmosphere

What is energy, and how can it be transferred from one place to the other?

Energy is defined as the capacity for doing work. It can exist in a variety of forms that can be changed from one form to another. Energy can be transferred from place to place. There are basically three ways in which this transfer can take place, conduction, convection and radiation.

Conduction consists of energy transfer directly from molecule to molecule and represents the flow of energy along a temperature gradient. Convection involves the transfer of energy by means of mass motions of the medium through which the heat is transferred. Both conduction and convection depend upon the existence of a medium in which to operate. This medium may be solid, liquid or gaseous. Radiation is the only means of energy transfer through space without the aid of a material medium.
