PARENT– CHILD RELATION SHIPS

From earliest childhood, convictional faith is shaped within caregiving relationships. With childrearing come parental decisions about spiritual upbringing. Over time, open discussions and further decision making are needed as children mature, as faith preferences change, or as spiritual questions arise. Sometimes children draw parents back to their religious roots. Grandparents may strongly voice their faith convictions for the spiritual development of their grandchildren. Those who previously accepted their child's nontraditional, interfaith, or same-sex commitment may shift to concern for their grandchildren. As one Christian grandmother expressed, "I thought I was OK with it all, but when I hold my grandbaby and see how precious and vulnerable she is, I worry that if something terrible happened to her, she wouldn't go to heaven."

Studies of highly religious families find a beneficial role of faith in parent–child interactions (Mahoney, 2010). Underscoring the importance of the "lived experience" of religion and spirituality, what matters most in childrearing is that parents practice what they preach (Marks, 2004). When parents are congruent in transmitting and following their spiritual values in
