The Publishers Weekly, 1998      Field Guide for Designing Human Interaction with Intelligent Systems Carroll G. Thronesberry, 1998

The characteristics of this field guide approach address the problems of designing innovative software to support user tasks. The requirements for novel software are difficult to specify a priori because there is not sufficient understanding of how the user's tasks should be supported and there are not obvious pre-existing design solutions. When the design team is in unfamiliar territory care must be taken to avoid rushing into detailed design requirements specification or implementation of the wrong product. The challenge is to get the right design and requirements in an efficient cost effective manner. This document's purpose is to describe the methods we are using to design human interactions with intelligent systems which support Space Shuttle flight controllers in the Mission Control Center at NASA Johnson Space Center. Although these software systems usually have some intelligent features the design challenges arise primarily from the innovation needed in the software design. While these methods are tailored to our specific context they should be extensible and helpful to designers of human interaction with other types of automated systems. We review the unique features of this context so that you can determine how to apply these methods to your project. Throughout this field guide goals of the design methods are discussed. This should help designers understand how a specific method might need to be adapted to the project at hand.
