

(family Asilidae) are to other insects what falcons are to other birds: swift predators on the wing. They vary greatly in size (3–50 mm long) and shape (long and slender to compact and robust). They are most diverse in the western and central U.S. All can be recognized by the usually "bearded" face and the concave top of the head between their eyes. Many act like flycatchers, perching on logs, foliage, twigs, or the ground, cocking their heads at insects passing overhead, and dashing out to apprehend a victim. In the few cases in which their life histories are known, robber fly larvae are external parasites of beetle grubs or larvae of other insects. There are close to 1,000 species in North America.

The genus Laphria includes remarkable bumble bee mimics. There are at least 63 species on the continent. Look for them in forests where the canopy opens or there is dappled sunlight. The eastern Laphria grossa often alights on stumps of oak and elm. It is known to feed on Japanese beetles. The smaller Laphria thoracica is quite common in the northeast U.S. It sometimes stakes out apiaries and feeds on the honey bees. The color pattern varies greatly among individuals. Laphria saffrana probably mimics queens of the Southern Yellowjacket (p. 336). Look for it in pine forests and coastal plains of the southeast. Laphria astur ranges in the northwest. Laphria index is probably a complex of several species, transcontinental in Canada and the northern U.S., marked with metallic copper or orange on the thorax and abdomen. Laphria canis probably represents another species complex occurring mostly in the east.

Efferia is an enormous genus with 100 species in North America, many of them very common, especially in the west. Watch for them in dry, open habitats such as fields, thickets, and forest edges, where they land on posts and other exposed perches. Males have conspicuous bulbous claspers on the tip of the abdomen and are marked with dazzling silver bands. Females use their swordlike ovipositor to deposit eggs in dead flower heads, cracks in the soil, and other crevices.

Promachus is a widespread genus in North America, with 21 species here, including Promachus hinei of the central states. You might hear this species before you see it, as it departs its perch with a loud, buzzing flight, quickly alighting again nearby, usually on a vertical branch or twig.

Members of the genus Mallaphorina are recognized by their bright green eyes. The 13 species in North America prey almost exclusively on bees and wasps. Mallaphora includes 14 species in North America, bee mimics that prey mostly on honey bees, bumble bees, and wasps.

The genus Proctacanthus includes 18 North American species. They are large flies, capable of taking prey the size of grasshoppers. They are seen mostly in grasslands and on shrubs along the margins of woods and swamps, but a few species hang out on riverbanks.

Asilus is a large genus, with 74 species in North America. Asilus sericeus ranges over much of the eastern U.S. This is one of the first robber flies of spring in the southern part of its range, but adults are on the wing through August. Look for them resting on twigs, weeds, or open ground.
