

and magnifies the picture greatly about that point, the curve is stretched out to become much more nearly equal to the tangent line:

The more closely we look, the less difference there is between the curve and its tangent line at that point. Thus, if light is reflected from a curve at a single point, it reflects just as it would from the tangent line at that point. For the same reason, the tangent line has another property that will be important to us later on: if the curve is actually the path of a moving object, the tangent line shows the direction of the object's motion at each point. When we think of the ellipse as the path followed by a planet in its orbit around the Sun, the tangent to the ellipse at each point will be in the direction of the planet's instantaneous velocity at that point.

The law of reflection from a flat mirror is that the ray strikes the mirror and is reflected from it at the same angle, like this:
