Daniel Abraham,2021-02-11 Golden retrievers are descended from the Staghounds which they were used primarily as hunting dogs. The Staghounds were used as dogs that could retrieve birds that were in water or on land because they hunted groundhogs in ponds and marshes. As guns were introduced, they were able to bring back birds from farther distances. To develop the retriever, the Baron of Tweedmouth, Dudley Marjoribank, crossed a Tweed water spaniel with a yellow-colored retriever. The fur was then used in further breeding with lines including the Irish terrier, bloodhound, and St. John's water dog, and black retriever. Historical records through the late 19th century showcasing the development of a dog with a flat mouth for retrieving game but without terrier traits. The breed gained popularity in England and was recognized by the Kennel Club of England in 1911. During the early 20th century, golden retrievers were introduced to North America as a hunting dog and became the most popular breed. The American Kennel Club in 1925 when the AKC debuted the AKC Obedience Champion title in 1977, they further earned the designation as a working dog. Golden retrievers include the one developed by the Royal Family and the Royal Golden Retriever Club. Golden retrievers grow rapidly and should be on a low-calorie puppy diet that will keep them from growing too fast and prevent their risk of bone disorders. An adult golden retriever should be fed two meals a day of about 1.5 cups of dry dog food. It is important to monitor their food intake rather than leaving food out for free feeding. The amount needed for an adult varies depending on its size, activity level, and other factors. You should always provide fresh water. Be sure to monitor your dog's weight as obesity will shorten your pet's lifespan and reduce their health. If uncertain, consult your veterinarian. Get recommendations from your veterinarian about feeding schedules, amount, type of food, and exercise to keep your dog healthy.
