From the Easy Chair George William Curtis, 2018-09-20 Reproduction of the original From the Easy Chair by George William Curtis From the Easy Chair (Complete) George William Curtis, 1893-01-01 The house was full and murmurous with the pleasant chat and rustling movement of well dressed persons of both sexes who waited patiently the coming of the orator looking at the expanse of stage which was carpeted and covered with rows of settees that went backward from the footlights to a landscape of charming freshness of color that might have been set for the Maid of Milan or the pastoral opera Between the seats and the foot lights was a broad space upon which stood a small table and two or three chairs and if the orator of the evening like a primo tenore had been surveying the house through the friendly chinks of the pastoral landscape he would have felt a warm suffusion of pleasure that his name should be the magic spell to summon an audience so fair so numerous and so intelligent There were ushers who showed ladies to seats and with their dress coats and bright badges looked like a milder Metropolitan police But no greater force was presumed to be required of them than pressing aside a too discursive crinoline In the soft ample light as the audience sat with fluttering ribbons and bright gems and splendid silks and shawls so tranquilly expectant so calmly smiling so shyly blushing if haply in all that crowd there were a pair of lovers it was hard to believe that civil war was wasting the land and that at the very moment some of those glad hearts were broken but would not know it until the sad news came Yet it was easy in the same glance to feel that even the terrible shape that we thought we had eluded forever did not seem after all so terrible that even civil war might be shaking the gates and the guests still smile in the chambers But while leaning against the wall under the balcony the Easy Chair looks around upon the humming throng and thinks of camps far away and beating drums and wild alarms and sweeping squadrons of battle there is a sudden hush and a simultaneous glance towards one side of the house and there behind the seats at the side and making for the stage door marches a procession two and two very solemn very bald very gray and in evening dress They are the invited guests the honored citizens of Brooklyn the reverend clergy and others a body of substantial intelligent decorous persons They disappear for a moment within the door and immediately emerge upon the stage with a composed bustle moving the seats taking off their coats sedately interchanging little jests and finally seating themselves and gazing at the audience evidently with a feeling of doubt whether the honor of the position compensates for its great disadvantage for to sit behind an orator is to hear without seeing an actor The audience is now waiting both upon the stage and in the boxes with patient expectation There is little talking but a tension of heads towards the stage The last word is spoken there the last joke expires all attention is concentrated upon an expected object The edge of eagerness is not suffered to turn but precisely at the right moment a figure with a dark head and another with a gray head are seen at the depth of the stage advancing through the aisle towards the foot lights and the audience They are the president of the society and the orator The audience applauds It is not a burst of enthusiasm it is rather applausive appreciation of acknowledged merit The gray headed orator bows gravely and slightly lays a roll of MS upon the table then he and the president seat themselves side by side For a moment they converse evidently complimenting the brilliant audience The orator also evidently says that the table is right that the light is right that the glass of water is right and finally that he is ready In a few neat words the honored son of Massachusetts is introduced and he rises and moves a few steps forward From the Easy Chair George William Curtis,1891 From the Easy Chair George William Curtis, From the Easy Chair C.W.
